"Riemann, March 6.—A desperate rencontre took place yesterday at Weldon, North Carolina, in which Mr. Magrau, mail agent on the southern route, was so seriously injured by a pistol shot that his life was despaired of when last heard from. It appears that some dispute arose between Mr. Magrau and two persons named Everett, (father and son,) with regard to some small amount of money. The Everetts kept a small store at the railroad station, and Magrau had been in the habit of purchasing from them. Angry words were passed, one epithet causing another, until each became greatly excited. One of the Everetts drew a six-barrelled pistol and knocked Magrau down, hitting him a heavy blow on the head. When thus prostrated and struggling, the elder Everett fired his pistol, and one of the balls passed through Magrau's neck, causing a dangerous wounds. The two Everetts are represented as being desperate. Mr. Magrau also had a pistol, which he drew in self-defence, but at the time was so weak as to be unable to use it. The assailing parties were not arrested at last to use it. The assailing parties were not arrested at last accounts. There were but slight hopes of Magrau's re-

WASHINGTON, March 4, 1855

Sta: It appears, from information which has reached the imperial commission for the universal exhibition, that the different States of the Union intend each to appoint several commissioners to represent the interests of their exhibitors at Paris, and that the State of New York, in particular, had selected four commissioners for that purpose. This commission, struck with the inconveniences which would be occasioned by the presence of so large a number of delegates, has decided that it will only admit one from each State in the Union, leaving it to those among them who have appointed everal commissioners to designate the one who shall place himself in official relation with the is-perial commission.

I hasten, sit, to inform you of this decision, praying you, at the same time, to give it all desirable publicity; and I seize this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.
